Entered at the Postoffice Alexandria, Virgin-First Glimpses of Dixie. Assuming that he was not in a Pullman the traveller has discovered that he is in a new region, or more accurately, a new environment, from the time he crossed the Potomac. The low, soft, slow speech, with its languid long vowels and neglected final endings, has caught his car, and he listens to its music without trying to follow the words. There is a difference, too, not very marked at first, but still perceptible, in the dress. The people all seem to know each other, and they talk with easy familiarity of personal concerns as members of one family. The conversation is more personal for that reason, the tones less depressed. The women will appear less expensive ly dressed. A man will probably no-tice this; for they will be generally prettier than those he left the other side of the bridge, and they will have some see more men offer seats to ladies. He will be surprised to see how many get off at Alexandria; for the little station at which the train stops and the poor streets through which the train passes will give him an idea of meanness in the place. Should he, however, stop there, and be so fortunate as to know some of his fellow-travellers who have got off, he will discover that the view of the town which he has had from the car window gives but an indifferent idea of the place itself. He will find it old, it is true, and bearing unmistakable marks of narrowness of means; but the want of money is not poverty, and the old age is not decrepitude. The streets are paved in the old-fashioned way with cobblestones, which look strange to one who has been rolling through the asphalt avenues of Washugton: The houses are often antiquated, and sometimes out of repair, but there is something impressive in it all. There are no marble palaces on the street corners, but the old square houses with their classic porti-cos, on the streets or set back in the yard amid the old trees, are homes, not mere monuments of wealth and pride; the stain on them is that of time and of the elements, not a chemist's concoction; and they have sheltered through generations a pure, kindly, and home-loving people. The splen-did marble shaft that towers to the memory of Washington is on the other side of the river in the city which bears his name, and which is even a more splendid monument to the great Vir-ginian; but the old church where he met his neighbors and worshipped God is in Alexandria. It was on this side of the river that he learned the sub-lime lessons which made him the foremost American and the greate-te tizen that the world has known

Down the broad river only a short dis-tance is the home where he lived as a

Virginia gentleman, and the simplicity of which he adorned with the elegance

As soon as we reach the old town we are on historical ground. The house where Braddock rested when the young Virginian who was to be known as the ther of his country was his volunteer aide is still shown, and the road that leads away towards the west is still called "Broddock's Road," after the brave but ill-fated British general.

Here, too, British troops landed to ravage when the city across the river was out a village; and here in the late war came the first army which invaded Virginia to march on Richmond and end the war during a summer holiday. Away to the westward, only a little distance, is Bull Run, where the sum-mer-encampment idea was terribly destroyed, and here the shattered army returned to prepare for war in earnest.

From here to Petersburg lies the way that the armies took, in campaign after campaign, and this explains in part the appearance of the country. This region was "swept by the besom of war," to use the old phrase, and the besom of war sweeps clean.—From "The Old Dominion," by Thomas Nelson Page, in Harper's Magazine for December.
